ABSTRACT

The perspective of sustainability development, the agricultural and rural economy supports the preservation of natural resources and assists in preventing poverty rural areas. It was particularly important during the early transition process, when social and economic relations between producers and consumers of the planned economy were suddenly interrupted and exchanged for dynamic and changing relations based on price mechanisms. This immense change in the institutional framework had significant implications for agricultural and rural development, have no alternative resources available for territorial development, agricultural development is essential for the economic growth of the area. A lot of studies have been undertaken to measure the influence of the agricultural sector on the economy in terms of its multiplier effect, i.e. how much one unit of added value in the agricultural sector is generating in the other sectors downstream and upstream of the agricultural sector. The paper provides a approach that recognizes the importance of the interdependence between rural and urban areas, fostering investment, rather than distributing subsidies. This paper focuses on an analysis the concept, structure of development and revitalization towards regional or country context.
